There is a pass in the Caucasian mountains along which runs a trail that no animal can turn on and no two animals can pass each other on. Below the trail there is a chasm 700 feet deep, and this place within the lest few years has come to be known as "The Jew's Leap." This is the Ir the spring of 1878 a party of Jows, ten in number, were on their way with a pack of heavily laden mules to the Don country, where they were to attend a fair. It was ever the custom for parties coming over from the north to send a man shead on foot to see if the road was clear, parties from Circassia having the right of way.

If the road was all right, the man sent in front fired off a bomb, the explosion of which told as it echoed along the pass that Captain Blatzky, who was going south with a small escort of mounted Cossacks, wholly ignoring this precaution, said to his guide: 'There are no soldiers coming this way. The only party we can meet is some Jew-ish peddlers, and if they get in my way I will hurl them over the citifs."

There was nothing left for the soldiers but to obey, so they rode on, and at length entered the pass, Captain Blatzky bringing up the rear. The setting sun was pouring his level rays through the defile when the Russian mached the highest and narrowest point, and here they were brought face to face with the Jewish traders, who, by the custom of the place, had the right of way. When Captain Blatzky saw the party that opposed him, he drew his sword and shouted out: "Curse the dogs! Hurl them over the cliffs and ride on ' The Jews heard the savage order and mules, as the Russians were their norses.

"We have the right of way," replied the foremost Jew, whose only weapon was a stout staff. "You have no rights," roared the Rus-

"Pitch him over and stop his talking," yelled the officer. 'Try it and take the consequences,' was the spirited response.

The guide leaged forward with drawn sword, and the merchant, a stalwart young man, raised his staff and stood on Boy—Jis' takin a walk. the defensive.

After fenning for a few seconds the Jew's staff was cut in two, but before his assailant could strike him with his sword he leaped forward and caught him in his arms, and the two fell over the cliff and dashed in a bleeding mass on the rocks below. The second Russian sent the lew's burdened mule after his master and then stood face to face with another resolute man armed only with a stout stick. The Russian lost a precious second of time in trying to draw his pistol, for the staff whistled above his head, and unconscious and never to be conscious again he tumbled into the depths. Then the Jew sent the Russian's borse after him and and come face to face with a second man.

Both parties were now wrought up to a frenzy that blinded them to all considera-The Russians were like bloodthirsty savages who find their slaves rising against them in revolt. The Jews lost their habitual prudence and were stung to a desperate resistance by the memory of generations of outrage and rapine. In the dense settlements the Russians might be masters. Here they were man to man, with all the advantage of arms

With such a warrry as never burst from Jewish lips since the Maccabees led Israel to victory the young man swept every living thing from his path until he came face to face with the last man, Captain Blatzky. The Russian fired his pistol straight into the young man's face, making a serious but not fatal wound. Certain it is it did not stay the irresistible onset. The officer's sword leaped up, but it was too late. He felt the wet blade at his throat, and the next instant he had joined the men he had so ignominiously led to death.

The surviving merchants hastily made their way into Turkish territory, where they were safe, leaving behind them a name and a memory that will last as long as the mountains, "The Jew's Leap."-Exchange

"Of course," said some one who was a
